

From Learning to Action: Case Studies in Summer Program and Camp Evaluation

Ann Gillard, Ph.D.

The Hole in the Wall
Gang Camp

Laurie Browne, Ph.D.

American Camp
Association

Questions

1. What were the key organizational features that allowed the program to engage in “evaluation as learning” instead of “evaluation for accountability”?
2. What were the specific ways each camp used their evaluation findings? What were the barriers to evaluation use?
3. What conventional and innovative methods for learning did these camps use? How can these methods be replicated in other settings?
4. How did each camp learn from their findings and what actions did they take? What other actions could they have taken to promote learning?

Closing

1. Summer programs' contexts are unique.

Closing

1. Summer programs' contexts are unique.
2. Tools are out there to measure outcomes.

Closing

1. Summer programs' contexts are unique.
2. Tools are out there to measure outcomes.
3. Shifting from “evaluation for accountability” to “evaluation for learning” has potential to help camps and summer programs conduct systematic evaluations and use results to improve programs, train staff, and advocate for summer program experiences to broad audiences.

Closing

1. Summer programs' contexts are unique.
2. Tools are out there to measure outcomes.
3. Shifting from “evaluation for accountability” to “evaluation for learning” has potential to help camps and summer programs conduct systematic evaluations and use results to improve programs, train staff, and advocate for summer program experiences to broad audiences.